Infill is a Linux based operating system aimed at non-computer users. Infill projects are designed to be easy to use and to prevent users from doing the wrong thing. Infill Patch Pack 1 is a set of patches for Microsoft Windows based on Infill 1.6.0. The patchset is delivered in binary packages with some additional scripts to help you set up windows user accounts on your infill install. To install, extract the infill package and run the setup script. Quote: "...What it is not? It's the kind of a tool which will be more useful in case of home user. Great feature is the ability to chose the language the whole program will be displayed in. I will definitely have to check when it will be available for win version. As the source code is available the author is probably able to provide a win version soon enough." (emulated) We put many of our patches on CNet Download.com, which is a reliable open source alternative to the "big 6". Infill is designed to be easy to use. Just click on the software icon and it will be started. You will be asked a question on what you want to do. Then it will be loaded. You can look around, try to see what you can do, and when it is working, just press Close and the program will be closed. The Infill package is just the software part of Infill. You still need to install Infill onto a FAT disk. A few minor features and bugs are still under development. If you find a problem with Infill, email us at support@infill.com or search the forum using the information at the top of the page If you like the installer, feel free to download and try the Linux version, called "Openmyn": Now for the fun part: Try it and give us feedback! We are not affiliated with Infill Software. We just like Infill. We try to translate the software into other languages and to submit the results to Infill Software. If you like this effort, we would like to continue for

It has no unnecessary additional sales, banner or popup ads.The invention relates to a composition and method of treatment of a material by corona discharge so that the material has substantially higher resistance to a corrosive agent (e.g., hot alkaline solution) than untreated corona discharge treated material. Corona discharge is an energetic stream of electrons produced when a voltage is applied to a conductor, such as a material. Typically, a high potential, such as xcx9cxc2xd to 1.5 kV, is applied between two opposing electrodes, such as carbon rods, with the material under treatment being disposed between the rods. When so treated, the surface of the material becomes contaminated with a corona discharge product. The product of such a contamination is hydrocarbon or other organic molecules and polymers which bind with surface oxygen and/or hydroxyl groups. Depending on the nature of the material being treated, the contaminant can be a relatively persistent molecule. A number of methods of removing corona discharge-contaminated products from the surface of a material have been proposed. For example, it has been suggested to immerse the material in a protective bath to prevent the migration of these products on the surface and to remove the contaminated material with a solvent. Another method involves scraping the contaminated material from the surface of the material in the form of a powder. Both of these methods have a number of disadvantages. For example, the first method introduces a dangerous change in the electrical charge of the material, and requires a large volume of the contaminant-depleted bath. Since the bulk of the bath remains charged, the treated material must be quickly removed from the bath, before the bath itself is electrified. This is inconvenient for the user, and requires frequent attention of the technician to avoid discharge of the charged material. It would be desirable to
