the present study, we can conclude that patients with renal diseases and diabetic patients treated with metformin for a long time, developed hypersensitivity reactions to metformin. These reactions are more likely to be revealed with normal renal function. If the patients have renal dysfunction, then metformin has to be discontinued before the initiation of these agents. Some studies have shown that metformin may increase the activity of some enzymes such as Na/K ATPase and 5'-nucleotidase. This probably can explain the onset of dermatological side effects in patients with renal dysfunction. Another study showed that drug-induced rash with eosinophilia and systemic symptoms (DI-RSE) is a sign of hepatic injury associated with metformin therapy. This can help for differential diagnosis of a drug-induced rash in patients who are on the chronic treatment of metformin \[@CR20\]. Furthermore, renal failure may affect the drug pharmacokinetic (absorption, distribution, excretion and metabolism). Renal failure leads to a reduction in the plasma level of metformin. Therefore, the doses of the drug may need to be adjusted for a better drug response in these patients. It seems that the pharmacokinetics of metformin seems to be independent of the kidneys. However, metformin dialyzability or binding to plasma proteins is considerably increased in end stage renal disease \[@CR21\]. In conclusion, these patients need to be evaluated for hypersensitivity reactions to metformin. Premedication with an antihistamine and diphenhydramine is suggested for these patients. If the patient's general condition is normal, metformin may be initiated after a wash out period.

CONCLUSION {#Sec5} ===== Our study showed that patients with renal failure and diabetic patients who are on treatment with metformin, may develop metformin hypersensitivity reactions. Therefore, a diagnosis of metformin hypersensitivity reaction should be considered in these patients. These reactions are more probable to be revealed in patients with normal renal function.
