Advertisement Lateralized cortical atrophy in epilepsy. Cortical gray matter atrophy is a consistent finding in patients with epilepsy and has been associated with the development of focal seizures. The extent of atrophy is variable, depending on the seizure focus. We hypothesized that the degree of lateralization in the cerebral cortical atrophy associated with epilepsy is variable, and that there is a relationship between lateralization and the severity of seizure frequency. We studied the extent of cortical atrophy in 47 patients with epilepsy by computerized tomography. We computed the asymmetry index of cortical atrophy using the ratio between the hemispheres of cortical thickness at two levels: cerebrum (at the level of the corpus callosum) and cerebellum. The relationship between lateralization of atrophy and the degree of lateralization of seizure activity was tested in the 47 patients, as well as the relationship between lateralization of atrophy and the severity of the seizure frequency. There was a significant lateralization in cortical thickness at the cerebrum ($P = .001$) and cerebellum ($P = .005$) levels. There was no relationship between the degree of lateralization of cortical thickness at the cerebrum level and the lateralization of seizure activity ($P = .43$) and between the lateralization of cortical thickness at the cerebellum level and the lateralization of seizure activity ($P = .35$). There is a significant lateralization of cortical atrophy in patients with epilepsy, which is independent of the degree of lateralization of seizure activity.
