features and commands in AutoCAD, including the following categories of features and commands: Entering and editing content, including text, blocks, polylines, arcs, and points; importing and exporting content; formatting content; drawing objects and references; controlling the display and printing process; and editing the drawing or printing workspace. Creating layers, navigating the workspace, and managing layers, blocks, and other objects; editing layers; and working with objects that are shared or hidden. Creating views, selecting objects for drawing, navigating the viewports, and setting up the viewports. Linking to and importing other drawings and data; importing and exporting objects; exchanging data with other AutoCAD products; and browsing external data and drawings. Entering and editing content The content of AutoCAD is text, blocks, lines, arcs, and points; sometimes it is referred to as the "geometric content" of a drawing. AutoCAD stores content in the form of geometric primitives and text, often also referred to as "objects." Geometric primitives Autodesk added text to AutoCAD in 1997. It did not include text editing tools, however, until AutoCAD Release 2011, which introduced text editing commands. Text is the primary content used to enter text, label objects, and record a drawing. Text-formatted content includes fonts, style, and formatting information. It also includes information about the type of content, such as text, labels, and dimensions.

There are two main text-formatting types: AutoCAD's native text-formatting method. Text created by external applications, such as Microsoft Word or Adobe Illustrator. AutoCAD uses its own native text-formatting method when you format text using a text-formatting command. AutoCAD includes several text-formatting tools to manage text, including an AutoText toolbox that includes commands for creating and editing text, and a text-formatting palette that contains all the text-formatting commands that AutoCAD supports. Some of these commands are found in the Standard toolbar, or in a pop-up menu from the toolbar. If you use an external application to format text, the text-formatting commands that you use are specific to that application. If you want to make changes to the style or formatting of the text that you created with that
