At Texas State, ballins are born Javier Alcaraz-Gaitan is otherwise known in East Texas as the valedictorian of the Class of 2016. But, even though he is being celebrated for becoming the only student to graduate with honors in his attending class, it is another student who has been buzzing around making big news. And it's no ordinary buzzing. That student is the World Champion of the popular video game "Mario," and the best part about Mario Ballin' is that the 25-year-old Internet sensation hails from Texas. "I would say this kid has sort of turned Mario from an eccentric and annoying character into kind of a hero," says Henry Puccio, a professional video-game designer in Paris, who says the Canadian's name is Mario Lemieux. Puccio says that he met the Canadian while at the "Games of Fame and Legend" event in August. The event is held in Las Vegas, where special guests and press can interact with the people who have historically influenced pop culture. Players can compete against the legends or entertain them. The Vancouver native caught Puccio's eye. "As soon as I saw his Mario character and some of his silly antics," he says, "I thought, 'That's not British, I've got to ask him about why he made a character that's not British.'"

For the HCM-LVH group, the difference in cardiomyocyte diameter between responder and non-responder HCM-LVH patients was significantly lower than in the non-HCM-LVH group. This was not an unexpected finding since HCM-LVH and non-HCM-LVH can be considered as two different clinical phenotypes in this study. Several theories have been proposed to explain the maladaptive hypertrophic response in HCM-LVH. One of these theories was the loss of endothelial-derived protection by modified nitric oxide release from sympathetic nerves ([@B2]). The endothelial-derived nitric oxide is known to modulate cardiovascular development and function ([@B6]). To our knowledge, this is the first time that endothelial dysfunction has been suggested as a possible mechanism of maladaptive HCM-LVH in the present study. Although the results of this study do not permit conclusive statements concerning the pathophysiological mechanisms in this disease, the present study was able to show that in patients with HCM-LVH, the degree of ventricular dilatation is not related to the effectiveness of α-MDE and that the cardiomyocyte diameter is related to response to this therapy.
