We invited EA's Chief Technology Officer Greg Canessa for a live interview to discuss the launch of the new PES and FIFA games, together with the goals of the ongoing development of FIFA Ultimate Team, and his thoughts on the future of sports video games. Q: Greg, firstly, let's talk about the upcoming PES and FIFA games. In addition to the new Pro Evolution Soccer, can we expect anything new from FIFA? A: Firstly, we announced the FIFA Ultimate Team Free-to-Play for PS3/PS4, and now we are almost ready to release FIFA Ultimate Team. Then we are developing FIFA Mobile, and there are two versions, one for iOS/Android and the other for web browser/PC. These are all long-term plans, so we are sure to see some surprises when all of these will be delivered to you. We will do our best to deliver all of these as soon as possible, we have not missed anything. Q: On FIFA, what are the goals of the development team? A: The main goal of FIFA development is to make people love the game. We pay a lot of attention to making sure the game is fun and addictive, and we get that by letting the players experience some amazing things with innovations such as ball physics, gameplay through the High Definition presentation, the use of the engine in the game, etc. When we released FIFA 19 a few months ago, we saw more than 2 million concurrent players online. This is a great achievement, and if we continue to develop FIFA in the same way, we can do even more. I hope we can accomplish this goal, and that you will love the new version of FIFA as much as you do the current version. As a new feature, we are trying to introduce something like "Share Mission" in the game, in the near future. As you play the game in "Share Mission," you will be able to play with other online users, experience a new world together, so the goal of bringing that to you will certainly be more than a new feature. Q: On the technical side, what are the challenges of creating the new generation of game engines? A: The most important technology that we developed for the new generation of game engines is the body-tracking technology called "BodyWorld." This is a technology that creates the feeling of reality in the virtual environment by
