The Black Keys Perform On Jimmy Kimmel Live The Black Keys are called the "band for New York," and that's exactly what they did on their 2013 tour. Check out the clip above to see them perform "Gold on the Ceiling." They also talked about exactly how they came up with "Gold on the Ceiling" and explained why they think it's one of their all-time favorite songs: The Black Keys are currently on their first ever "Dueling Piano" tour, and you can check out photos from the performance (including the one up top) HERE. The war on government-sponsored religious schools is winding up. By the time that the British Parliament returns to Westminster to resume its sittings, there will be little there to do. Most of its remaining items will have already been scheduled for passage, or dispatched to another session. Most of the items on Parliament's agenda for this short term are those that either already have royal assent, or will shortly receive it. The bill to set out the new framework for sex-selective abortion - or "sex-selective termination" - passed unanimously with only one Labour MP voting against. The Children and Families Bill, which will bring the measures in the Children and Families Bill of 2016 into effect, has an amendment on which there is yet to be a vote. Opposition to the changes to the Care Standards Act introduced in 2016 has been based on the principle that children in care should be better looked after, and not on the grounds that such standards might prevent them falling into the hands of foster and adoptive carers. The Government successfully sought to amend the bill to ensure that older children and young people could not remain under the supervision of their parents until the age of 18. This amendment was based on the children's commissioner's report from 2017, which warned that preventing people from being watched by the people who love them was putting some young people at risk. With people not being allowed to stay in the care of their own parents, it was inevitable that the bill would also be amended to prevent schools from teaching students from 11 to 14 about sex and relationships. This is partly because the children's commissioner found that few schools are doing so. The bill will now become the Education Act 2018, which will be rushed through the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and received royal assent, before Parliament begins its Christmas recess. It will become the legislation of the 21st Century, the legislation of the time since the Sexual
