In the uprising against the Gods, the leader of the kherons, Alalik, dies in the last battle and falls into the buffer for souls. This is where his adventure begins. You need to find a way out of the buffer of souls into the world of the living in order to continue to fight against the Gods or come to terms with your death and go to a new world to meet the unknown. business of making multiplayer games. The company behind Fortnite and even one of the creators of PlayerUnknown's Battlegrounds created the city-builder known as Construct. It's a game with a simple message -- no matter where you land in the world, it's your city and you can do whatever you want with it. There's no winners or losers -- no matter how many times you win or lose, it's simply a fun playground. The game follows the general formula for city builders. There's a top-down perspective with an overhead view, where the camera roams around the perimeter of your city. The real action is in the bottom-right corner where you can see the small schematics of the city's main buildings and a list of the resources you can extract -- gold, wood, and stone. A wrench icon indicates the status of your needs and the ability to build new items. Clicking the wrench gives you a menu of four simple, visual choices. You can build a house for people to live in, a house for people to sell items in, a house for people to steal from, or a house for people to sell stolen items in. These start small and grow each time you build a new one, so the addition of more homes provides more spaces for resources. You do it all with your own vehicle, a bicycle that can carry
