Where I've had to go through a lot of steps just to get to relevant content. Is there some guide on how the internet should work like news sites. Like Digg for News sites or something similar. So that any one with a computer can go to a site like this and easily get to the content they are trying to get to. ===== byoung2 _Is there some guide on how the internet should work like news sites_ Check out the Google news guidelines: My Google News posts, and the posts of other newsbloggers, work off of this set of guidelines. If you look at the Google news home page right now, it's almost identical to the newsgrader, our single-page aggregator of Google stories. The same layout, same styles, same way to submit stories, same user experience. Only the names are different. This might be too late to get this in on the home page, but we can be found at ----- alrex021 Thanks for your reply @byoung2 Also if you have any other sites to suggest of similar sites I'd be really appreciative.

Nickel has been an effective catalyst for the polymerization of ethylene. The polymerization is particularly useful to provide clean, efficient, and low cost methods for producing alpha-olefin polymers such as propylene. Recently, nickel has been found to be useful for preparing stereoregular propylene copolymers having a bimodal or multimodal molecular weight distribution. However, in order to be useful for propylene polymerization, the catalyst used must have certain selectivities and must be capable of providing high levels of activity. Increasingly, activity and selectivity are seen to be competing factors in developing new propylene polymerization catalysts. Total mobility for the iPhone 5 will return on June 29th Apple just sent out invites to an event on June 29th and Twitter is having a field day about it. There is some speculation as to what the company will be announcing on the big day, and while it will probably be the iPhone 5 and maybe a lower-end iPad, there's something else being thrown about too. If you go back to the Apple Event invite, you'll notice that it has a total mobility option listed, which points to a new MacBook Air model. It could be a high-end model, with increased performance and battery life. Or it could be something completely different, like a low-end model. The MacBook Air line has been in flux for quite some time, as the lowest-end model is going to be $999 and there isn't really anything in the middle. This line is notorious for having low battery life and low specs, so it's a smart move to put a MacBook Air on display and make the pricing fairly aggressive. Even if it's just a low-end MacBook Air with better specs and reduced price, the possibility of a higher-end MacBook Air in 2013 is not as far fetched as you would think. Q: Replacing views with fragments in Android One of the things I've heard when it comes to Android development is "Don't replace a view with a fragment. Replace a view with multiple fragments." What is the problem with just using a single view but having one of the fragments fill it while the other fragments are filling spaces in the area that would
